

Umwelt and the Sensory Worlds of Animals

Every organism inhabits a perceptual world built from the signals its body can register. A tick responds to butyric acid, warmth and touch; the rest of the forest does not exist for it. Photography inherits this problem: a camera registers light the human eye cannot, and ignores everything outside its spectral window.